Prospec's of the American War. From the London Times.

The Americans entered on the fourth year their civil war with pledges on both sides that the new campaign should be more eventful and decisive than any which had preceded it. One part of this promise has certainly been kept. The expeditions and the battles of 1894 have been conducted with extraordinary determination. No Federal Commander has ever shown himself so resolute to win as Grent in Virginia, or so enterprising and tenacions as Sherman in Georgia. The armics engaged on the side of the North have been larger, and better appointed than ever, while General Lee has established more conspicuously than before the ascendancy of the South in military genius and organization. But hitherto, although the loss of life has been enormous and the; prodigality of expenditure in all respects unexampled, there has been little decisiveness in events. nor can we say of this mement to which side the balance of fortune inclines. On behalf of the Confederates it may be maintained that they have tormi ned Commander. The force which advan- to turn their urms against Fort Morgan. This conced southwards at the beginning of May was the sideration alone howe that Anderson, whatered strongest force ever equipped by the North and may have been his motives, did not do a soldier's it was in excellet hands. If Grant was not an accomplished General, he was an intrepid and means. Nevertheless up to this hour he has been completely foiled by the superior skill of his antagonist, and the resources at his commund are now to all appearances so nearly exhausted that it is hard to see what success greater than a sale retreat remains within his reach. He has kept his promise of "fighting it out all the summer." but without the result which he anticipated. Through three long months he has marched and countermarched, manogyred and fought, until no new device or strategy seems left to be tried, but the end is that Richmond safe while Washington is menaced, and that Loe is master of the field. It is true that the campaign is not yet over, and that war is full of uncertainties. But the strongest partisans of the Federal cause can hardly expect that the Virginian Expedition will be anything it a most comprehensive, moral If Grant and his army could do nothing, it is scurcely conceivable tha tany other Northern army could do better, and the cautselessubionue plain that the grea object of the Federals-the capture of Richmond -is obso utely unattainable. For the Federals however, t may be truly said that the campaign in-Georiage places their military power in a muro favouwith fina This result, too, would failure but a rable light than before. Nobody imagined that a Northern army could nenetrate so far into the South and maintain itself so securely as Sherman's army has now done for months together. Neither his distance from the base of his operations, nor the difficulties of obtaining supplies, nor may of the numerous embarrassaments incidental to a nosition in a hostile country, have impeded his proceedings. He has not notually captured Atlanta, nor are his prospects of success so good, perhaps, as they were a short time ago ; but if he is defeated it will only be by hard fighting, exectly as he might have been defeated at Chattanooga or Mur freesborough. He can hold his own in the heart of Georgia, and encounter the Confederates on equal terms. He may yet be repulsed, butho has shown that there is nothing impracticable in an expedition which would have been thought position on Confederate territory, but shed a lustre on the campaingn, and perhaps affect to some extent the views entertained of the war. Upon the whole, it my be said that the extraordinary indecisivencess which has uniformly characterised this desperate contest is as remarkable now as ever. Neither side can do anything effectual nominal the other Grant cannottake Richmond, nor can Lee de more Maryland, Sherman cunuot cap. ture Atlanta, while Hood cannot drive him away, Itseems not impossible that Admiral Forrabut may augupy Mobile, but if he should do so we have already seen from the example of New Orleans how little such victories actually contribute to the great object of the North. The Governor of New Orleans, at the head of 50,000 men, could not march from one town in Louisiana to another. He was attacked by Southern forces and so completely routed that it was with difficulty he could excape in rafety to the city under his command. The North bas ravely lost ground once occupied, but the South has rendered all such positions useless. 50 far as any impression on the country is concerned. lose, The North undertakes to subdue the South and redfice its population to submission; the South of burning pain, from the mouth down to the Spring side Boots. simply undertakes to resist this attempt, and has stomach. London, Friday Evening, August 26.

From the Globe. The success of the Federals at Mobile is far greater than was at first reported. The statements in the telegrams are all derived from Confederate gorces, and are, therefore, not open to question. Admiral Farragut had not only carried his fleer into the bay in the tooth of the fire of work intonded to prevent the passage of an enemy; he had induced the Confederte Commander-in-Thief at Mobile to evacuate and blow up one line of works supposed to bar the entrance known as Grant's Page, and he had induced the officers in command at Port Gaines to surrender that post; thus obtaining complete nonsession of one entrance, and a matified control over another. It was on the 5th f August that Concral Maury thought fit to blow. up Fort Powell, which, with its dependent batteries in the sand islands, barred Grant's Pass. It was on the 8th that Colonel Anderson, in defiance, it is prolonged and serious illness of the proprietor. worthy of notice that the Confederateaby the blow- known as that of ing up of Fort Powell, and the deliberate surren. der of free ageess to Grant's Pass, isolated Fort Coince; and must have materially tended in demorelise the garrison and their commander. Still a brave and faithful soldier would, under the cirournstances have held out to the last. It would have been the best service be could render to the Confederacy, for the reduction of Fort Gaines would have taken time, and would have employed completely defeated their enemies at the most the land force, now free for other operations, which important point and in the principal operations is under the orders of Farragut. The reduction of of the campaign. It was allowed on all sides that P rtMorgan in Mobile Point was alone required to the expedition to Richmond was the enterprise in give the Federal navy complete control of all the which the chief issue was involved. But successful as Parragut had been, up to het resolute soldier, proof against discouragement, and 8th of August he was yet far from the capture of bent upon winning at all hazards and by any Mobile. All accounts agree in representing the defences of that city, both by land and sea, as very strong. Indeed one recent visitor to the place declares it to be "one of the west strongly fortified places in the world." From Dog River on the south to Pintes Point on the cast of the east of the Alabama river etretobes a line of works which have uttracted the especial attention of philitary men. are said to be not less formidable on the side facing the land thun on the curve of the shore facing the bny. March, river, island, and shoul have been made use of by the engineers. The channel leading up to the city is shallow, and entirely commanded. The approach to it is over a bar several miles below the town. Thue, what with beavy batteries and shallow waters, a priori one would say that a mere naval force is quite inadequate to the capture of the place, and that were an army present to co-operate with the ficat, the issue would still be doubtful. On the other hand, it must notbe forgotten that extensive works require multitudes to defend them. It is one of the disadvanlages of ascheme of defence by a long line of entrenchments that the latter cannot be scenrely hold by a mere garrison, such as would suffice for a fortress, but demand an army to take care of them. - In the case of Mobile this as true as in the case of Richmond and Atlanta. We know not, however, what force there was in Mobile, nor with what force the Federals were operating against it. The probability s that, including the militia, the Confederates had a superfectorce; but that they were not very numerous may be justly inferred from the evacuation of For Powell. On the whole it seems probable that Admiral Farragut will take Fort Morgan, and possess hunself of all the water-ways leading to Mobile, thus shutting it out from the ocean; but that the apprehsions of the Confederates for the safety of the place itself will prove to have been unfounded, unless indeed the garrison, including the militin, are far weaker than we can believe them to be in a place of such population and importance The news from other quarters is of no great inoment. The Federal armies hefore Petersburg and Atlanta are not reported to have performed any general prospects, too, of the North are brightened operation. What was actually in progress on that side, how strong the Pederal army there employed was, with what object it advanced, and with what force leet; it would be met, on these points we have no information whatever.
